The Fountain Of The Love

The fountain brings forth the water, into which Cupid dips his arrows or from which lovers drink and fall in love. In nearly every period, artists have painted this romantic motif. During the 1700s, artists came to treat the Fountain of Love almost as a genre subject, with lovers in contemporary dress flirting in a garden around a decorative fountain.

The Fountain of Love, dated 1748, originally served as a finished cartoon for a tapestry, one of a series of six known as the Noble Pastorales; another one of this series and this painting's pendant, The Bird Catchers, is also in the J. Paul Getty Museum. Beginning in 1755, the Beauvais tapestry manufactory wove the tapestries directly over the cartoons.

Most of his patrons, rich noblemen or members of Louis XV's court, had either been exiled or guillotined. At this time, Fragonard began a series of paintings which explored the allegories of love in less frivolous ways, and this is one such painting. According to legend, the fountain of love had the ability to set hearts aight with love, and this painting, Fragonard beautifully illustrates a young couple eager to drink from the fountain, in which two cupids offer the pair a cup to drink.
